Internal Medicine

Overview

Internal Medicine, one of the most intellectually demanding medical specialties, focuses on the diagnosis and management of diverse diseases using a combination of pharmacological & non-pharmacological approaches, often involving small procedures. In this course, we invite medical students to embark on a comprehensive exploration of the main subspecialties within internal medicine, including cardiology, nephrology, and gastroenterology, among others.

A competent physician in internal medicine must possess a range of skills and knowledge acquired during clerkships. This includes developing a clinician's mindset, the ability to quickly and effectively understand complex patients, and strategic use of interventions, whether pharmacological or otherwise. Additionally, a comprehensive understanding of the gold standard management for common conditions informs the processes of screening and referral, leading to improved outcomes and enhanced quality of life for patients.
